Dr. Hartman-Stein has received national recognition in her career as behavioral health consultant, educator, and clinical psychologist specializing in treating adults and late life families. She has worked as a psychologist in settings such as hospitals, primary care, long-term care facilities and in the private practice she founded, the Center for Healthy Aging. She is a national advocate for improving the behavioral health of older adults, serving on Medicare technical advisory panels. Currently she provides consultation services to families regarding elder care, conducts educational webinars on mental health and aging, leads reflective writing workshops for professionals and the public, and is a regular contributor regarding aging issues for The National Psychologist newspaper.
